TABLE OF CONTENTS

TABLE OF CONTENTS (Continued)

AUTHORITIES CITED

CASES: Page

AUTHORITIES CITED (Continued)

AUTHORITIES CITED (Continued)

IN THE
SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES
October Term, 1971

No. 71-1417

BOOSTER LODGE NO. 405, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS AND AEROSPACE WORKERS, AFL-CIO,

Petitioner,

versus

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD AND THE BOEING COMPANY

No. 71-1607

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD,

Petitioner,

versus

THE BOEING COMPANY AND BOOSTER LODGE NO. 405, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS AND AEROSPACE WORKERS, AFL-CIO

On Writs of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

---

BRIEF FOR THE BOEING COMPANY

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Court of Appeals is reported at 459 F.2d 1143 (Pet. App. 5a-33a).[1] The opinion of the National Labor Relations Board is reported at 185 NLRB No. 23 (Pet. App. 34a-46a). The decision of the Labor Board's Trial Examiner is reproduced at A. 2-47. A companion opinion of the National Labor Relations Board is reported as International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, Local Lodge No. 504 (Arrow Development Co.) and David O'Reilly, An Individual, 185 NLRB No. 22 (Pet. App. 47a-67a).[2]

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on March 14, 1972 (Pet. App. 1a-3a). Petitions for writs of certiorari were granted on December 18, 1972 (A. 205-6).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. If a union is not precluded by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act from fining its members for crossing a picket line, the reasonableness of the

---

[1] "Pet. App." refers to the petition for a writ of certiorari of Booster Lodge No. 405 (i.e., the Union) in No. 71-1417. "A" refers to the separate appendix to the briefs.

[2] Remanded to Board, sub nom., David O'Reilly v. N.L.R.B., ____ F.2d ____, 82 LRRM 2073 (C.A. 9, 1972), requiring that the Board determine the reasonableness of a fine. The reasoning in support of the remand is expressed in Morton Salt Co. v. N.L.R.B., ____ F.2d ____, 82 LRRM 2066 (C.A. 9, 1972).

amount of the fine is a matter to be determined by the National Labor Relations Board.[3]

2. Whether, given a union constitution which prohibits a member from "[a]ccepting employment where a strike ... exists," a member of a union may escape union discipline, exerted by the levy of a court-collectible fine, for violation of his union obligation to refrain from strikebreaking by resigning from his union subsequent to the commencement of a strike and engaging in strikebreaking after his resignation.[4]

STATUTE INVOLVED

The relevant provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (61 Stat. 136, 73 Stat. 519, 29 U.S.C. 151, et seq.), are as follows:

> Sec. 7. Employees shall have the right to self organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all such activities * * *.

---

[3]This question was stated in different form by each petitioner. In No. 71-1417, the Union stated the question as follows: "Whether the National Labor Relations Board is empowered to determine the reasonableness of a fine assessed by a union against a member for violating its valid rule against strikebreaking." In No. 71-1607, the Board presented the question as follows: "Whether the National Labor Relations Board, in determining whether a union committed an unfair labor practice by assessing and seeking court collection of a fine against a member for violating a union rule against strikebreaking, is required to determine whether the fine is reasonable in amount."

[4]The quesion here is as stated in the Petitioning Union's brief, page 2.

* * * *

Sec. 8(b). It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents —

(1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 * * *; Provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein * * *.

STATEMENT

I. The Strike, The Fines And The Board's Findings Of Fact

The Boeing Company operates a plant at New Orleans, Louisiana, known as the Michoud plant (A. 3). The production and maintenance employees at this plant are represented by the Union and its parent, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO. It is estimated that in September, 1965, approximately 6,000 employees were employed at Michoud, of which approximately 1500 to 1900 employees were in the unit represented by the Union (A. 3-4). A contract between the Union and The Boeing Company was in effect from May, 1963 to September 15, 1965. The contract provided that unit employees who are members of the Union or who become members are required to maintain their membership as a condition of employment. Employees hired after the effective date of the contract who are not members of the Union have a specified period in which to give notice that they do not desire to become members of the Union. (A. 3-4).

Upon the expiration of the contract on September 15, 1965, the Union struck and picketed Boeing at Michoud and other locations. The strike ended on October 3, 1965, and a new contract was entered into. During the strike, certain employees who were in the contract unit at Michoud crossed the picket line and worked. Some of these employees resigned from the Union prior to returning to work. Another group of those members who returned to work during the strike made no effort to resign from the Union. Others resigned during the course of the strike, but returned to work before submitting their resignations. All resignations, however, were submitted after the expiration of the 1963-65 contract and before the signing of the new one, and all were submitted prior to the imposition of disciplinary actions by the Union. A. 4; Pet. App. 36a.

In late October or early November, 1965, the Union notified all employees who returned to work during the strike that charges had been preferred against them under the International Constitution for "Improper Conduct of a Member" in "accepting employment ... in an establishment where a strike ... exists."

Employees were advised of the dates of their trials, which were to be held even in their absence. Prior to the strike, the Union had not notified or warned members about the possible imposition of disciplinary measures. In fact, the Union had never before imposed disciplinary fines on any of the members for any reason. A. 4-5; Pet. App. 36a.

Fines were imposed on all employees who had returned to work during the strike, regardless of whether, or when, they had resigned from the Union. Those employees who did not appear at their trial were fined $450; those who appeared and were found guilty were also fined $450.[5] The fines of about thirty-five employees who appeared for trial, apologized and plead loyalty to the Union were reduced to fifty percent of the earnings they received during the strike. The Union sent out written notices to the fined employees that the matter had been referred to an attorney for collection, that suit would be filed if the fines remained unpaid, and that reduced fines would be reinstated to $450 in the event of nonpayment. The Union filed suit against at least nine employees to collect the fines (plus attorney's fees and interest). For instance, a citation dated April 11, 1966, shows the amount as $630 "with legal interest." The amount of $630 was based upon the $450 fine, plus $180 attorney's fees. A. 6-7; A. 134-5; Pet. App. 8a-9a.

---

[5]There is no evidence that anyone was found not guilty. The disciplined employees were also barred from holding office for a period of five years. A. 6, ftn. 2.

On February 18, 1966, the Company filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board, alleging that the Union had violated Section 8(b)(1) of the Act, and a complaint was issued by the Board's General Counsel. Pet. App. 9a-10a. The complaint alleged that the fines were unreasonable, excessive, and discriminatory. It further alleged that the Union levied fines against certain employees who had resigned from the Union prior to working during the strike and prior to being fined, and these fines were also alleged to be unreasonable, excessive, and discriminatory. A. 2.

A request was made to the Company by the Union that the employment of certain of the fined employees be terminated, and it was not until January 8, 1968, that the Union withdrew its request. A. 201-4. Additionally, on October 13, 1965, the Union published and issued to all employees its house organ, "The Space Travelers," wherein the Union stated that its mailing list is accurate and up-to-date for members only, and instructed the members to "pass your paper on to 'someone listed' and 'you know who,' so that they will know that WE KNOW." The reference to 'someone listed' is to two pages of names of employees who allegedly "crossed the picket line and/or wrote letters of termination of their membership" during the strike. The names appear under the following heading:

WE SHALL NOT FORGET!!

Also on page one, over the signature of the Union's Business Representative, the employees were told:

THE 10% WHO WORKED BEHIND THE LINES, COMMONLY CALLED SCABS, MUST HAVE A GUILTY CONSCIENCE TO ACCEPT THE GAINS WON BY OTHERS.[6]

The record shows that the Michoud plant was severely damaged by Hurricane Betsy and was closed for three or four days, reopening just a matter of a few days before the strike. Employees who worked during the strike were deprived of the benefits of the Union's hurricane relief fund.[7] A. 19-20. By letter or otherwise, there was no notification to the employees by the Union that it had reduced or would reduce the fines to fifty percent of earnings under some circumstances. A. 6. This alleged policy purportedly was instituted in the "first part" of 1966. Ibid., n. 3.

The employees involved in the instant case normally earned approximately $2.38 to $3.63 per hour, which would mean a gross earning of approximately $95 and $145 per 40-hour week, respectively. A. 18.

At the time of the 1965 strike, the Union's Constitution and By-Laws contained no provisions for voluntary resignations from membership. It was the Union's position that the resignations were an exercise in futility and it regarded them as having no effect. A. 11. According to the Union, by action which postdated the events in this case, the International Constitution has been amended to provide that resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment during a strike if the resignation occurs within the period of the strike or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Union's brief, page 58. But the contract between the Union and the employer binds the member to membership for the duration thereof. A. 154-8.

---

[6] A. 192-200.

[7] The Trial Examiner discredited Business Representative Higgins' claim that the Union did take the hurricane situation into consideration regarding the fines. A. 6-7.

II. The Board's Decision And Order

The Union was alleged to have violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by (1) fining its members an unreasonable and excessive amount for violation of the Union's rule against working for a struck employer and threatening to and initiating court action to collect same, and (2) fining in any amount those persons who had resigned from the Union for their activities subsequent to their resignation. A.2. The Labor Board's Trial Examiner sustained these allegations, and concluded that the fines levied against those employees who had been resigned from the Union were unreasonable. A. 43-47. The Trial Examiner devoted a considerable portion of his decision discussing how "reasonableness" should, in his opinion, be determined. A. 15-42.

The Board found that the Union's imposition of disciplinary fines upon individuals who had resigned from the Union before engaging in the conduct for which the discipline was imposed violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, regardless of the amount of the fine. Pet. App. 37a et seq.[8] The Board further found that the Union did not violate the Act by imposing disciplinary fines upon members who did not resign but worked during the strike, and that the Union did not violate the Act by fining former members for returning to work prior to their resignations, but that the imposition of discipline for conduct engaged in after their resignations was illegal. Pet. App. 42a-43a. The Board ordered the Union to cease and refrain from the conduct which it found to be violative of the Act, and to reimburse or refund to any employees who have paid fines levied against them for any conduct which occurred subsequent to their resignations. With regard to those employees who returned to work before resigning but who subsequently resigned, the Union was ordered to remit a prorata portion of the fine, so that what remained reflected only preresignation conduct. Pet. App. 43a-44a.

A majority of the Board found that the legality of the fines does not depend on their reasonableness, and did not adopt the Trial Examiner's findings, conclusions and recommendations on that issue. Chairman McCulloch dissented in this regard; he would examine the amount of the fines to determine their reasonableness in those situations where the Union's imposition thereof and threatened or actual court action to collect such fines would in all other respects be lawful. (Where expulsion from membership is clearly the only available method of enforcement, he would consider the size of the fine irrelevant). Pet. App. 42a, n. 16. In so holding, the Board relied upon Arrow Development Corp., 185 NLRB No. 22,[9] issued on the same day as the decision and order in the instant case. Ibid. In that case, the majority concluded that Congress did not intend to have the Board regulate the size of fines and establish standards with respect to their reasonableness. Pet. App. 55a, et seq. Chairman McCulloch's full dissent is at Pet. App. 58a-67a.

---

[8]Member Brown dissented with regard to this finding. Pet. App. 45a-46a.

In two cases, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has reversed the Board majority on this question, and it has remanded those cases to the Board. David O'Reilly v. N.L.R.B., supra; Morton Salt Co. v. N.L.R.B., supra.[10]

III. The Decision Of The Court Of Appeals

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit agreed with the Board that the Union acted within the sphere of its lawful authority in imposing fines on the members who did not resign from the Union before returning to work (Pet. App. 13a), that the Union did not violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) so far as its imposition of disciplinary fines concerned the pre-resignation conduct of those employees who returned to work and then resigned (Pet. App. 15a), and that the Union violated the Act by imposing fines upon employees, and by threatening or attempting enforcement of such fines, because of those employees' post-resignation conduct in working during the strike (Pet. App. 21a).

---

[9] International Association of Machinists And Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO (Arrow Development Co. and David O'Reilly, An Individual), Case No. 20-CB-1947. Pet. App. 47a, et seq. See footnote 2, supra.

[10] See footnote 2, supra.

The Court unanimously refused to accept the Board's majority conclusion that Congress did not intend to empower the Board with the authority to examine the severity of Union discipline when ascertaining its legality, and remanded the case to the Board for further proceedings. Pet. App. 22a-23a. In so doing, the Court stated (Pet. App. 25a):

> Since the imposition of an unreasonably excessive fine is violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A), it is clearly the obligation of the N.L.R.B. to resolve the question of reasonableness where such an issue is appropriately raised. * * *

The Court proceeded to set forth reasons why the Labor Board should determine the question of reasonableness, and enumerated a number of factors which it felt the Board could and should consider in resolving the question. Pet. App. 26a-30a.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I.

The Court of Appeals, in agreement with the Board, correctly affirmed the conclusion that "the Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by imposing fines upon employees, and by threatening or attempting enforcement of such fines, because of those employees' post-resignation conduct in working at the Company plant during the authorized work stoppage." The imposition of fines under such circumstances was held to violate the policies underlying the National Labor Relations Act and has effects outside the area of internal union affairs, and therefore they are clearly coercive within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A).[11]

It is only by virtue of the membership relationship that the union has any authority over the employee-member. Thus, when the membership relationship ceases to exist, so does the union's authority to take disciplinary actions. The sanctions allowed by the Court in N.L.R.B. v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 175 (1967), were against those who enjoyed full union membership. Even then, for the union's rule to be valid and enforceable, the members must be free to leave the union and escape the rule. Scofield v. N.L.R.B., 394 U.S. 423 (1969)

---

[11]Pet. App. 21a.

The employees here had no obligation to continue their membership in the Union when the 1963-65 contract expired. Pet. App. 20a-21a. Thus, having relinquished their membership, they were free to "refrain from engaging in any and all concerted activities," including observance of the Union's picket line. See Section 7 of the Act, page 3, supra.

Contrary to the Union's assertion, there is no continued duty, implied or otherwise, on the former member to refrain from returning to work subsequent to his resignation. The Union would have the Court supply a contractual or other obligation where none exists. All resignations in question here were submitted after the expiration of the 1963-65 contract, and before the execution of the new agreement, and all were submitted prior to the imposition of any Union discipline, or threats or warnings. Pet. App. 7a. The Union's Constitution and By-Laws make no reference to resignations.

The subsequent insertion into the Union's Constitution of a provision purportedly prohibiting members from accepting employment at the struck establishment,[12] effective over seven years after the Michoud strike had ended, can have no effect here. Heretofore, the Constitution was silent with regard to resignations and the Union took the position that its members could not resign, except "by death." Moreover, the newly-added provision contravenes the purposes and policies of the Act, particularly Section 7 thereof, for, as a practical matter (considering the union security language of the contract), this provision will prevent any employee from being able to resign at any time, including during strike situations. Events occuring after a strike is called may have the effect, moreover, of changing conditions in such a manner that even if the employee were bound initially to join in the strike he should no longer be so bound. Additionally, it has the effect of "locking in" members who may not wish to strike at all, and prohibiting them from resigning from the union and exercising their rights under Section 7 of the Act.

[12]Union's brief, page 58.

The decisions of this Court demonstrate that in applying Section 8(b)(1)(A), the Board is required to make an accommodation between the right of a union to protect against erosion of its status as exclusive bargaining representative through reasonable discipline of members who violate valid rules governing membership, and the right of employees, conferred by Section 7, to refrain from engaging in union activity. They further indicate that the union's right of discipline flows from the fact that, in joining the union, the member agrees to abide by lawful union rules and policies, and that a member may escape the discipline by leaving the union.

The very fact that a worker gives up so much freedom of action in joining a union supports the conclusion that he must ultimately have the right to leave the union if he finds some aspect of its regulations intolerable. The Board was reasonable and correct in concluding that the members had a right to resign from the Union and that the Union's right of discipline was coterminous with the union-member relationship.

The contention of the Union[13] and of the AFL-CIO[14] that because of the Union's prohibition against members working for a struck employer the members have thus by specific commitment mutually promised each other to refrain from strikebreaking, notwithstanding resignations, is not tenable, and contrary to the provisions of Section 7 of the Act and to this Court's decisions. See Scofield, supra, page 13 and Granite State, infra, page 20. The qualification of Section 7 rights sought by the Union and the AFL-CIO would seriously curtail employees' Section 7 rights to refrain from engaging in union activity. Even where a member's support of any rule or policy, such as increased dues or assessments, may actually be shown, such support may be viewed as a waiver of any right to oppose the rule, but it can hardly be viewed as a commitment to remain a member or support the rule (e.g., pay dues) after he has resigned. Support at one time of a particular union project may not be construed in derogation of Section 7 rights, so as to commit a member irrevocably to union membership or to support of a union rule once he has left the union.

Where a member lawfully resigns from a union and thereafter engages in conduct which the union rule proscribes, the union commits an unfair labor practice when it seeks enforcement of fines for that conduct.

---

[13]Union's brief, pages 58-59.
[14]Amicus curiae brief, pages 16-17.

II.

The Board contends that it has no authority to determine the reasonableness of an otherwise lawfully imposed fine by a union upon its members. It also argues that Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act does not require the Board to determine whether a judicially enforceable union fine imposed upon a member for breach of a valid union rule is reasonable in amount.[15]

Contrary to the contentions of the Board, the Union and the AFL-CIO,[16] in order for an otherwise valid union fine to be legal under Section 8(b)(1)(A), it must be reasonable in amount or size, and the Labor Board not only is empowered to determine the question of reasonableness, but it is the proper forum for doing so.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit specifically stated that the Board's belief that it does not have the obligation of examining the reasonableness of union fines in Section 8(b)(1)(A) proceedings is based upon a clear misconception of the law and the Supreme Court's relevant decisions. Pet. App. 23a. The decisions of the Supreme Court, in Allis-Chalmers, and Scofield, supra, make it clear that the reasonableness of the fine must be determined before the legality of the fine, under Section 8(b)(1)(A), can be determined.

---

[15]Board's brief in No. 71-1607, page 8.
[16]Amicus Curiae brief, page 2, et seq.

The position of the Board on this question is inconsistent with the preemption doctrine. See San. Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, infra at page 41. As the court below noted, the possible existence of a concurrent state court remedy does not relieve the Board of its duty to adjudicate the remedy of unfair labor practices under the Act. The state courts are reluctant to become embroiled in such matters, and there is a compelling need for national uniformity and guidance in such matters. Pet. App. 25a-27a. Moreover, the Board is not without expertise in related areas. It has long been called upon, under Section 8(b)(5) of the Act, to determine whether initiation fees required by a labor organization are excessive. See Radio & Studio Employees Union, infra, at page 40. The fact that Section 8(b)(1)(A) does not provide the Board with specific standards to be applied in determining the reasonableness of a union fine, while Section 8(b)(5) does include some express standards, does not detract from the Board's authority and responsibility under Section 8(b)(1)(A). "Experience and common sense will supply the grounds for the performance of this job." N.L.R.B. v. Radio and Television Engineers Union, infra, page 39.[17]

A fine imposed for the violation of a union rule should be viewed with close scrutiny. Such fines should be permitted only when needed for protection of legitimate union interests. If the amount of the fine is in-ordinately disproportionate to the needed protection, an inference is warranted that the fine was imposed upon the member, not in vindication of a legitimate union interest, but rather as a reprisal for having exercised a statutorily protected right. Pet. App. 29a.

---

[17]364 U.S. at 583.

The Board's contention that for it to determine the reasonableness of the amount or size of union imposed fines would require it to protrude itself into the internal affairs of a union which was not contemplated by Congress either in the Taft-Hartley Act or in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act not only is without merit but it is contrary to the Board's own decisions. The Board has stated that the Department of Labor is directly responsible for the administration of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, but that in determining the legality of union fines, the Board is charged with "considering the full panoply of congressional labor policies." Carpenters Local Union No. 22 (Graziano Construction Company), 195 NLRB No. 5, 79 LRRM 1194 (1972). In that case, the Board recognized and decided that a union may not, under the guise of enforcing internal discipline, deprive members of rights guaranteed under the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act to participate fully and freely in the internal affairs of their union.

It is the Board, and not the state courts, which has been entrusted to determine the true motivation of employers and unions alike in taking disciplinary actions against employees. The Board has developed that particular expertise in resolving issues under Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(b)(2) of the Act. The same expertise should be applied in determining the reasonableness of otherwise valid union fines.

ARGUMENT

I. A Union Violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) Of The National Labor Relations Act By Fining Employees Who Resigned From Union Membership And Returned To Work During A Lawful Union-Authorized Strike, And By Seeking Judicial Enforcement Of The Fines.

In N.L.R.B. v. Granite State Joint Board, Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO, 93 S.Ct. 385 (1972), the Court held that, where neither the contract nor the Union's constitution or by-laws contained any provision defining or limiting the circumstances under which a member could resign, a member is free to resign from his union during the course of a strike and then return to work without incurring the liability of a court-collectible fine imposed by the union to discipline him for his post-resignation return to work. The Court did not consider an initial membership vote to strike, or a later membership resolution subjecting any member aiding or abetting the employer during the strike to a $2,000 fine, to suffice as a restriction on resignation.

As the Union points out,[18] the Court did state, "We do not now decide to what extent the contractual relationship between union and member may curtail the freedom to resign. But where, as here, there are no restraints on the resignation of members, we conclude that the vitality of Section 7 requires that the member be free to refrain in November from the actions he endorsed in May and that his Section 7 rights are not lost by a union's plea for solidarity or by its pressures for conformity and submission to its regime." (93 S.Ct., at 387; footnote omitted).

[18]Union's brief, page 57.

Contrary to the Union's assertion, however, the question purportedly reserved in Granite State is not presented in this case. Here, the Union's constitution and by-laws made no provision for resignation from membership, and the resignations were submitted subsequent to the expiration of the old collective bargaining agreement and prior to the execution of the new one, and prior to any disciplinary action being taken or threats of same by the Union.

A. Joining the Issue

The Board holds, with court approval, that in the absence of an explicit contrary restriction upon the effect of resignation, a member's resignation from his union in the midst of a strike frees him from any obligation he may have had to refrain from returning to work during the strike, after his resignation. The Board reasoned that in joining a union, the individual member becomes a party to a contract-constitution, and in so doing, without waiving his Section 7 right to refrain from concerted activities, he consents to the possible imposition of union discipline upon his exercise of that right. But, the Board reasons, "(T)he contract between the member and the union becomes a nullity upon his resignation. Both the member's duty of fidelity to the union and the union's corresponding right to discipline him for that duty are extinguished." Pet. App. 39a-40a.

The Union contends, however, that the issue before the Court is the interpretation of the post resignation breach of a union rule against working for a struck employer.[19] The question here is no different from the one submitted to the Court in Granite State, supra; i.e., "Whether a union violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act by fining employees who resigned from union membership and then returned to work during a lawful union-authorized strike, and by seeking judicial enforcement of the fines."[20]

B. The Decisions Of The Courts Make It Clear That Members Are Free To Resign From A Union And Escape The Imposition Of Union Discipline For Post-Resignation Conduct.

We submit that the jurisprudence supports the opinions of the Board and the Court of Appeals for the

---

[19]Union's brief, page 62.

[20]N.L.R.B. petition for writ of certiorari, N.L.R.B. v. Granite State Joint Board, Textile Workers Union of America, Local 1029, AFL-CIO, October Term, 1971, No. 71-711, at page 2.

District of Columbia Circuit that, absent possible other considerations not present here, employee-members are free to resign from a union and escape imposition of union discipline for their post-resignation conduct. In such situations, the "internal affairs" of a union are no longer involved, and unions may not, by their constitutions or otherwise, infringe upon the Section 7 rights of the employees.

Local 1255, International Association of Machinists And Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO v. N.L.R.B., 456 F.2d 1214, C.A. 5, 1972, is not to the contrary. There, the court merely held that a union member who resigns during a strike and crosses his union's picket line to return to work may be fined by the union for his post resignation strikebreaking, when the fine is enforceable only by explusion from the union. More accurately, the Court held that the "thrust of the penalty was to recondition readmission to membership on the payment of the fine,"[21] a matter reserved to the union under the proviso of Section 8(b)(1)(A).

The Court's decision in Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., supra, does not support the Union's position. To the contrary, there the Court was not presented with the issue of resignations. In the decisions of the Board and of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the Union's right to fine a member for crossing a picket line was recognized, but it was held that the union's right to do so is extinguished by the member's effective resignation from the union before crossing the picket line.

---

[21] 456 F.2d at 1217.

In the Scofield case, supra, the Court held that a union did not violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) by fining employees who exceeded a production quota established by union rule and acquiesced in by the employer. The Court reasoned that "Section 8(b)(1) leaves a union free to enforce a properly adopted rule which reflects a legitimate union interest, impairs no policy Congress has imbedded in the labor laws, and is reasonably enforced against union members who are free to leave the union and escape the rule." 394 U.S. at 430; emphasis supplied.[22]

These decisions make clear that, in applying Section 8(b)(1)(A), the Board is required to make an accomodation between the right of a union "to protection against erosion of its status [as exclusive bargaining representative] through reasonable discipline of members who violate rules and regulations governing membership" (Allis-Chalmers, supra, 388 U.S. at 181), and the right of employees, conferred by Section 7, "to refrain from" engaging in union activity. They further indicate that the union's right of discipline flows from the fact that, in joining the union, the member agrees to abide by lawful union rules and policies, and that a member may escape the discipline by leaving the union.

---

[22]The Court added: "If a member chooses not to engage in this concerted activity and is unable to prevail on the other members to change that Rule, then he may leave the union and obtain whatever benefits in job advancements and extra pay may result from extra work, at the same time enjoying the protection from competition, the high piece rate, and the job security which compliance with the union rule by union members tends to provide." 394 U.S. at 435.

The very fact that a worker gives up so much freedom of action by joining a union (Allis-Chalmers, supra, 388 U.S. at 180) supports the conclusion of Scofield, supra, that he must ultimately have the right to leave the union if he finds some aspect of its regulations intolerable. In this case, as in Granite State Joint Board, supra, the union's constitution and by-laws contained no restriction on members' rights to resign and the retention of membership provision of the collective bargaining agreement had expired with the agreement.

The Board correctly noted (Pet. App. 40a):

> The holding in Allis-Chalmers was carefully restricted to the facts of that case. The Court expressly refused to pass on the legality of the imposition of a fine upon 'limited members' of the Union. It appears to us that in this reservation there is implication that such a fine when levied against non-members constitutes a form of restraint and coercion proscribed by Section 8(b)(1)(A). The decisions in two subsequent cases reinforce that implication. (Footnotes omitted).

No employee is subject to union rules if he chooses to forego the privileges and duties of union membership. Silard, Labor Board Regulation of Union Discipline After Allis-Chalmers, Marine Workers and Scofield, 38 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 187, 190 (1969). As stated by the Court of Appeals below (Pet. App. 15a, n. 10):

> Since unions are only authorized to impose discipline where legitimate internal affairs are concerned (citations omitted), it is clear that any effort to fine nonmembers would constitute an attempt to affect external activities, an area in which Congress did not intend to permit such union regulation.

The Court's opinion in Granite State, supra, disposes of any issue here. There, the Court expressly stated (93 S.Ct., at 387):

> The Scofield case indicates that the power of the union over the member is certainly no greater than the union-member contract. Where a member lawfully resigns from a union and thereafter engages in conduct which the union rule proscribes, the union commits an unfair labor practice when it seeks enforcement of fines for that conduct. That is to say, when there is a lawful dissolution of a union-member relation, the union has no more control over the former member than it has over the man in the street. (Emphasis supplied).

It appears that the foregoing language, after comparing the facts in Granite State and the facts in the instant case, squarely disposes of the second question presented by the Union in No. 71-1417. The arguments of the Union in its brief (p. 57 et seq) to the contrary merely beg the issue, rather than join it. The question assertedly reserved in Granite State is not presented in this case. Here, neither the contract nor the Union's constitution nor its by-laws defined or limited the circumstances under which a member could resign. In fact, it was the position of the Union that its members could resign only "by death." A. 11 Moreover, in Granite State, there was evidence that all of the resigning members against whom fines had been levied had participated in the vote to strike (93 S.Ct., at 387); no such evidence is present in the subject case.[23]

In its amicus curiae brief, even the AFL-CIO takes the position that the Board is empowered to preclude discipline of non-members (AFL-CIO brief, pages 7-8). The AFL-CIO states (Brief, page 8):

> ... Section 8(b)(1)(A), as it has been interpreted thus far, interdicts 'external' means of enforcement, measures union rules against external standards embodied in the NLRA, and prohibits the imposition of union sanctions against non-members, i.e., individuals external to the organization. (Emphasis supplied).

Moreover, since the collective bargaining agreement here provided that once an employee becomes a member he retains his membership only for the life of the contract term (Pet. App. 7a), it may well be argued that resignations were not necessary and that any membership obligations which may have existed were extinguished upon the expiration of the collective bargaining agreement. Accordingly, the decision of the Board and the Court below, that the employee-members were free to resign and escape the imposition of union discipline for post-resignation conduct, is reasonable and correct.

---

[23]Cf. concurring opinion of the Chief Justice, 93 S.Ct. at 388.

C. There Are No Facts Present Here Which Permit The Union To Discipline Former Members For Their Post-Resignation Conduct, And The Union May Not Now Impose Requirements Which Subject Employees To Union Discipline For Their Post-Resignation Activities.

1. The Granite State case, supra, p. 20, presented the court with an excellent opportunity to conclude that notwithstanding the absence of a provision in the union's constitution and by-laws or in the collective bargaining agreement regulating the rights of members to resign their membership, there were other considerations and factors present which deprived members of their right to do so. In fact, the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit had so held. Nevertheless, the Court held to the proposition that where there were no such provisions, members were free to resign at will and that the union no longer had any right to attempt to impose disciplinary fines upon them.

2. No factors to the contrary are present here. Moreover, a union may not, by constitutional amendments or otherwise, abridge the Section 7 rights of employee members to resign and to refrain from engaging in concerted activities, including prohibiting the employee from resigning his membership and returning to work during a strike. Regardless of any provisions which a union may attempt to impose, employees may continue to resign their membership and remain free from union disciplinary action, such as fines, for exercising their statutory rights.

3. The Union here would have the Court read into the restrictions as they existed in 1965 other obligations purportedly imposed on its members by constitutional amendments in 1972, effective January 1, 1973.[24] However, the purported amendment is patently invalid and illegal, regardless of when it was adopted; even if it were not, it could not be applied retroactively.

The facts demonstrate that if the purported amendment were to be given effect, it would, as a practical matter, deprive employee-members of the right to resign from the Union at any time, because (a) the amendment binds him to the union rules during a strike and (b) he is bound to membership during the life of the contract. A. 154-8. According to the Union's argument, at no time could a member resign until the strike ended following the 1963-65 agreement, and he could not do so even then because the new contract did not provide him with the opportunity to escape the future obligations of membership.

A Union may not, under the guise of prescribing "its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein,"[25] contravene either the express provisions or the purposes of the Act by denying to employees the right to refrain from union membership or from other protected or concerted activities.

---

[24]Union's brief, pages 58-59.

4. Once a member has effectively resigned, the union may not discipline him for his post-resignation conduct by attempting to impose fines upon him and attempting or threatening to collect those fines, or by any other means of discipline. ". . .(W)hen a member lawfully resigns from the union, its power over him ends." Granite State Joint Board, supra, p. 20 (93 S.Ct., at 386).

II. The Board Is Empowered And Required To Determine The Reasonableness Of A Fine Imposed Upon A Member By A Union For Accepting Work During A Strike In Breach Of A Valid Union Rule, And It Must Do So If The Fine Is To Be Collectible.

In Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., supra, p. 13, a majority of the Court ruled that a union can, without violating Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, obtain judicial enforcement of reasonable fines against its members who crossed a picket line in violation of a valid union rule. Subsequently, the Court stressed the implication of Allis-Chalmers that a disenchanted member may resign to avoid any rule he considers against his best interest. Scofield, supra, page 13. On December 18, 1972, in No. 71-1563; The Boeing Company v. National Labor

---

[25]Section 8(b)(1)(A).

Relations Board and Booster Lodge No. 405, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, ____ U.S. ____, the Court declined to reverse its decision in Allis-Chalmers, supra, holding that members may escape the disciplinary fines of a union by resigning from it, but those who remain members are subject to reasonable fines for violation of valid union rules. The Board is the proper forum for determining the question of reasonableness. The Court below,[26] and Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit[27] agree.

A. In Order For An Otherwise Legal Fine To Be Enforceable, The Amount Of The Fine Must Be Reasonable.

In Allis-Chalmers, the Court stated (388 U.S. at 183):

> It is no answer that the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A) preserves to the Union the power to expel the offending member. Where the Union is strong and membership therefore valuable, to require expulsion of the member visits a far more severe penalty than a reasonable fine. (Emphasis added).

The Court further recognized that "the proviso preserves the right of unions to impose fines, as a lesser penalty than expulsion ..." 388 U.S. at 191-2 (Emphasis supplied).[28] This implicitly recognized that, for a disciplinary fine to be less coercive than expulsion from the union, the fine imposed must be a reasonable one, for it is intuitively obvious that enforcement of a grossly excessive fine might visit a far greater burden upon an individual than would expulsion.[29]

---

[26]Pet. App. 23a-25a.
[27]See ftn. 2, supra.

In reaching its decision, the Court evaluated the position of unions as the bargaining representative of collective bodies of workers and their needs in this position, and weighed these considerations against the challenge to any interference with employees' Section 7 rights. The Court found that "Congress has seen fit to clothe the bargaining representative with powers comparable to those possessed by a legislative body both to create and restrict the rights of those whom it represents . . . ."[30] From an appreciation of the inter-

---

[28]Mr. Justice White, in his concurring opinion, observed:

> [S]ince expulsion would in many cases — certainly in this one involving a strong union — be a far more coercive technique for enforcing a union rule and for collecting a reasonable fine than the threat of court enforcement, there is no basis for thinking that Congress, having accepted expulsion as a permissible technique to enforce a rule in derogation of Section 7 rights, nevertheless intended to bar enforcement by another method [court action] which may be far less coercive.

388 U.S. at 198 (emphasis supplied). It is also informative to note the express interpretation given to the Allis-Chalmers opinion by the dissenting members of the Court: [T]he Court's holding boils down to this: a court-enforced reasonable fine for nonparticipation in a strike does not 'restrain or coerce' an employee in the exercise of his right not to participate in the strike.' 388 U.S. at 200-201 (dissenting opinion of Black, J.) (emphasis supplied).

[29]See Pet. App. 24a-25a.

[30]388 U.S. 175, 180, quoting Steele v. Louisville and N.R. Company, 323 U.S. 192, 202.

play of the Section 7 right to refrain from collective activity and the Section 8(b)(1)(A) prohibition on union interference with this right, as well as the legislative history of Section 8(b)(1)(A), the Court concluded that the "imprecise"[31] terminology, "restrain or coerce," of Section 8(b)(1)(A) was not meant to prohibit absolutely union imposition of fines. Rather, the Court held that reasonable fines are not a type of restraint or coercion prohibited by Section 8(b)(1)(A).[32]

The Court's decision in Allis-Chalmers thus confirmed the ability of unions to assess reasonable fines for strike-breaking, and outlined the interpretative framework in which analysis of union disciplinary action must take place. This reconciliation of the rights and obligations of union members under the Act was refined much further in the Scofield case. The issue before the Court there was the legality of union fines assessed against employees who disregarded a union rule setting a ceiling on daily pay for piece work performed for the Wisconsin Motor Corporation.[33] The Court considered the propriety of union fines as a disciplinary device and reaffirmed its Allis-Chalmers

---

[31]388 U.S. 192, 202.

[32]The Court, in Allis-Chalmers, chose to consider the overall scheme of the Act and to balance the needs of labor unions against the assertion of an absolute right of freedom of action on the part of union members. The Court did not adopt the Board's reasoning that the union's action was privileged by the Section 8(b)(1)(A) proviso: "Our conclusion that Section 8(b)(1)(A) does not prohibit the locals' action makes it unnecessary to pass on the Board holding that the proviso protected such actions." 388 U.S., at 192, n. 29.

[33]See the statement of facts set forth by the Trial Examiner in Wisconsin Motor Corp., 145 NLRB 1097 (1964).

decision that "[a] union rule, duly adopted and not the arbitrary fiat of a union officer, forbidding the crossing of a picket line during a strike was therefore enforceable against voluntary union members by expulsion or a reasonable fine." 394 U.S., at 428 (emphasis added). The Court expressly recognized that the enforcement of a proper union rule "by reasonable fines does not constitute the restraint or coercion proscribed by Section 8(b)(1)(A)." 395 U.S., at 436 (emphasis supplied).

The Supreme Court's decisions in Allis-Chalmers and Scofield established the following standards, each of which must be met if a union's disciplinary action against a member imposed because of the member's exercise of his Section 7 rights is to escape the prohibition of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act:[34]

(1) The fine must be reasonable;
(2) The fine must not be the mere fiat of a union leader;
(3) The members fined must be free to leave the union;
(4) The means used to enforce a rule must be acceptable;
(5) The rule must be supported by a legitimate union interest;
(6) The rule must not violate federal labor law policies.

A negative answer to any of these issues removes the union action from the protection of Allis-Chalmers and Scofield, and makes it a violation of Section 8(b)

---

[34] Scofield, 394 U.S., at 430-1.

(1)(A). The facts here show that the first three standards were not met. The Trial Examiner found that the fines were unreasonable in amount. Union fiat was also present in the treatment of the fined employees; the amount was determined before any hearing and the fine was imposed regardless of a member's knowledge or lack thereof of the rule, notwithstanding the fact that they were not warned in advance that such disciplinary action would or might be taken against them, and the Union had never previously imposed disciplinary fines on any of its members. The Union admits that employees fined were involuntary members because, according to the Union, it is impossible to resign from its membership.

The Court below, after reviewing Allis-Chalmers and Scofield, concluded (Pet. App. 25a):

> * * * In light of the Court's emphasis on the requirement of 'reasonable fines' if a union is to avoid a violation of the Act in these circumstances, we must conclude that the imposition of an unreasonably large fine, at least where the union threatens or actually attempts court enforcement of the fine, may be coercive and restraining within the meaning of section 8(b)(1)(A).
>
> Since the imposition of an unreasonably excessive disciplinary fine is a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A), it is clearly the obligation of the National Labor Relations Board to resolve the question where such an issue is appropriately raised. (Emphasis supplied).

In the Morton Salt Co. case, supra (82 LRRM at 2066)[35] the Court of Appeals, after reviewing Allis-Chalmers and Scofield, stated:

> While, again, the issue was not squarely presented to the Supreme Court, we particularly note the adjective 'reasonable' in the above-quoted portion of the [Scofield] opinion used in the context of enforceability and legality of the fine. The corrollary of this Scofield conclusion is that an unreasonable fine is an unfair labor practice. (Emphasis supplied; citations omitted).

After citing, with approval, the decision of the Court below herein, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit said, "We agree that the lawfulness of fines imposed depends, in part, upon the reasonableness of the amount . . ." 82 LRRM at 2071. (Emphasis supplied). The Trial Examiner who heard the instant case, after reviewing Allis-Chalmers[36], stated (A.13):

> We proceed, therefore, on the basis, as indicated by the Court, that under the body of Section 8(b)(1)(A) the fine imposed and enforced or sought to be enforced must be 'reasonable.'

Chairman McCulloch, dissenting in the O'Reilly case,[37] noted that the dissenting opinion in Allis-Chalmers interprets the Court's holding as limited in its scope to "a court enforced reasonable fine," citing [36]His decision issued before that of the Court in Scofield.

---

[35]See ftn. 2, supra

[37]See ftn. 2, supra; O'Reilly v. N.L.R.B.

388 U.S. at 200. (Pet. App. 60a). He further expressed his dissent as follows (Pet. App. 61a-65a):

> The Court's repeated use of the adjective 'reasonable' in both Allis-Chalmers and Scofield to describe the fines there in issue cannot be passed over casually as without significance. By its carefully drawn distinction between 'reasonable' and 'unreasonable' fines, the Court, it seems to me, meant not only to define the limits of its holdings in these cases, but also to indicate affirmatively that it regarded court-collectible fines which were unreasonable, either in their nature or size, as not serving a legitimate union interest, and therefore not privileged from the proscription of Section 8(b)(1)(A).

B. The Court Below Properly Remanded The Case To The Board With Directions That The Board Determine The Questions Relating To The Reasonableness Of The Fines Imposed By The Union.

In the decision the Board, relying upon its own decision in International Association of Machinists And Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO, Local Lodge No. 504 (Arrow Development Co.), supra[38] concluded that "the Act does not authorize this Board to evaluate the fairness of union discipline meted out to protect a legitimate union interest." Pet. App. 42a, n. 16. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, however, disagreed, and remanded the instant case to the Board for further consideration of the question relating to the reasonableness of fines imposed by the Union. Pet. App. 33a.

---

[38]See ftn. 2, supra. Remanded to Board, sub. nom. O'Reilly v. N.L.R.B.

The Court below observed (Pet. App. 26a-27a):

> ... (T)he business of the Board, among other things, is to adjudicate and remedy unfair labor practices. Its authority to do so is not 'affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, law, or otherwise . . .' * * * Furthermore, the fact that some state courts might not permit enforcement of excessive fines in a collection action by the union, does not detract from their coerciveness, or need for N.L.R.B. action. * * * (Footnotes and citations omitted).

The Court further stated, after rejecting the Board's "reverse preemption" argument, that it was emphasizing the fact that "(t)he function of striking that balance to effectuate national labor policy is often a difficult and delicate responsibility, which the Congress committed primarily to the National Labor Relations Board," citing N.L.R.B. v. Truck Drivers Union, 358 U.S. 87, 96 (1957), and added: "This is the very function which the Board is being asked to perform here."[39]

In Morton Salt[40], the Ninth Circuit Court, after agreeing with the District of Columbia Circuit Court, stated that an unreasonable fine is an unfair labor practice, (82 LRRM at 2070):

---

[39]Pet. App. 28a, n. 34.
[40]See ftn. 2, supra.

> A statutory responsibility of the Board is to adjudicate and remedy unfair labor practices. N.L.R.A. Section 10(a); 29 U.S.C. Sec. 160 (a). We conclude that the determination of reasonableness is for the Board. (Emphasis supplied).

And at 81 LRRM 2071, the Court stated, "We agree that the lawfulness of fines imposed depends, in part, upon the reasonableness of the amount, and that the N.L.R.B. is the proper forum for this determination." (Emphasis added).

1. The Board's argument that the Act does not "require" it to determine whether a fine imposed on a union member for breach of valid union rule is reasonable in amount does not meet the question presented. The Board advanced the same argument when it took the position that it was not authorized, empowered or required to award assignments of work in jurisdictional dispute cases under Sections 8(b)(4)(D) and 10(k) of the Act. The Supreme Court rejected that position in N.L.R.B. v. Radio and Television Broadcast Engineers Union, 364 U.S. 573 (1961), noting that "the Board need not disclaim the power given it for lack of standards."[41] Since that decision, the Board has developed "standards" for making affirmative awards in jurisdictional disputes which it applies uniformly, and which provide parties to such disputes with uniform guidance in the resolution or litigation of same. See, e.g., IBEW Local 743, 185 NLRB No. 106,

---

[41] 364 U.S. at 583.

75 LRRM 1164 (1970). The Board's expertise in interpreting Section 8(b)(5) of the Act is also of value to the Board in determining the reasonableness of such fines. The Board has exercised its experience in this area and, fairly recently, concluded that a union violated Section 8(b)(5) by imposing excessive initiation fees which restrained and coerced employees in their right to join a union. In so doing, the Board pointed to such factors as the fee being six times greater than the weekly wage of employees belonging to the union, and that it was twice as large as that of the union's sister local. Longshoremen, I.L.A. Local 1419, 186 NLRB No. 94, 75 LRRM 1411 (1970).[42]

Although Congress set forth broad, general prohibitions against illegal secondary activities by unions in Section 8(b)(4) of the Act, it has been the Board itself which has refined and interpreted the prohibitions, and it has been the Board which has established "standards" thereunder for regulating secondary picketing. For instance, the Act itself makes no reference to "common-situs" picketing. Yet, the Board has developed guidelines and standards for such situations.[43]

The court below recognized the fallacies of the Board's contention[44], as did the Board's dissenting member, then Chairman McCulloch. See Pet. App. 65a.

---

[42]See also N.L.R.B. v. Television & Radio Broadcasting Studio Employees, 315 F.2d 398, C.A. 3, 1963.

[43]See, e.g., Sailors Union of the Pacific (Moore Dry Dock Co., Inc.), 92 NLRB 547 (1950); Electrical Workers Local 1761 v. N.L.R.B., 366 U.S. 667 (1961); Brewery & Beverage Drivers Local 67 (Washington Coca-Cola Bottling Co.), 107 NLRB 299 (1953); and Electric Workers Local 861 (Plauche Electric Co., 135 NLR 250 (1962).

[44]See Pet. App. 23a; 25a; 28a-29a.

2. The Board's position as stated in Carpenters, Local 22, supra, is more in conformity with the congressional and judicial scheme of administration of labor laws and policies than is the position being taken by the Board in the present case; i.e., that it may not pass on the reasonableness of these fines. It was the purpose of Congress in establishing the Board to have one agency for the adjudication of issues arising from labor disputes.[45] Only recently, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed the "primary responsibility" of the NLRB for guiding the development of national labor policy.[46] To support the Board's preeminent position in the scheme of national labor policy, the Supreme Court in San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon,[47] and other cases, set forth the preemption doctrine.

> When an activity is arguably subject to Section 7 or Section 8 of the Act, the States as well as the federal courts must defer to the exclusive competence of the National Labor Relations Board if the danger of state interference with national policy is to averted.[48]

In such situations, the "power and duty of primary decision lies with the Board," rather than with one

---

[45] Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, 303 U.S. 41 (1938); Amalgamated Utility Workers v. Consolidated Edison of New York, 309 U.S. 261 (1940).

[46] N.L.R.B. v. Raytheon Company, 398 U.S. 25, 28 (1970).

[47] 359 U.S. 236 (1959).

[48] 359 U.S. 236, 245. Accord, International Longshoremen's Local 1416, AFL-CIO v. Ariadne Shipping Company, 397 U.S. 195, 200 (1970).

or several other tribunals, for the sensible reason that "a multiplicity of tribunals and a diversity of procedures are quite as apt to produce incompatible or conflicting adjudications as are different rules of substantive law."[49] Congressional concern for a coherent national labor policy naturally manifests itself in a corollary interest in "uniform application of its substantive rules [avoiding] diversities and conflicts likely to result from a variety of local procedures and attitudes towards labor controversies."[50]

3. The question of the "reasonableness" of a court-collectible fine is not one relating to the "internal affairs" of a union. The fact, alone, that the Union attempted to impose fines upon employees, and threatened or attempted enforcement of such fines against employees because of their post-resignation conduct, particularly when coupled with the Union's insistence that its members may not resign during the course of a strike and therefore they remained subject to the Union's disciplinary actions, had effects outside the area of internal union affairs, and clearly fall within the purview of the Board in interpreting and applying Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Pet. App. 21a-22a.

Moreover, inasmuch as the imposition of an unreasonable fine is coercive, per se, the proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A) is not applicable. See also Pet. App. 29a-30a.

---

[49] Garner v. Teamsters Union, 347 U.S. 485, 489, 490-91 (1953).
[50] San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 243, quoting Garner v. Teamsters Union, 346 U.S. 485, 490.

The contentions of the Board[51] and the Union[52] that the decision of the court below (and those of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit) would involve the Board in purely internal affairs of the Union ignore the above-mentioned factors, as well as the Board's own decision in Carpenters Local Union No. 22, supra, page 19. There, the Board held that a union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act when it fined a member for allegedly violating a union rule, where the union, according to the Board, utilized the union rule as pretext because of the fined employee's intraunion activities. In so holding, the Board stated, "The policies which the Union's conduct here seeks to frustrate are embodied in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, rather than specifically in the National Labor Relations Act. This difference does not, however, impel a different conclusion."

After referring to language from the Court's decision in Scofield, the Board stated (79 LRRM 1196):

> ... (T)he Board is charged with considering the full panoply of congressional labor policies in determining the legality of a union fine. Here the Union, in the guise of enforcing internal union discipline, has sought to deprive its members of the right, as guaranteed by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, to participate fully and freely in the internal affairs of his own union. A fine for that purpose not only in our opinion fails to reflect > a legitimate union interest but rather in fact impairs a policy that Congress has imbedded in the labor laws. (Footnote omitted).

---

[51]Board's brief, page 13.
[52]Union's brief, pages 17-19.

Similarly, then, an unreasonably excessive fine for working behind a picket line also "impairs a policy that Congress has imbedded in the labor laws" — the policy expressed in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, guaranteeing employees the right to refrain from concerted activities.

In a footnote in Carpenters, Local 22, supra, the Board noted (79 LRRM 1196, n. 5):

> ... We are not unmindful of the fact that the Department of Labor, and not this Agency, is directly charged with the administration of the requirement of the Landrum-Griffin Act. We traditionally respect this differentiation. * * * In this area, however, as we understand it, we have been specifically charged by the Supreme Court with the duty of determining the overall legitimacy of union interests, and must therefore take into account all Federal policies and not limit ourselves to those embodied in our own Act. (Citations omitted; emphasis supplied).

Therefore, in "determining the overall legitimacy of union interests," it is incumbent upon the Labor Board, and not the state courts, to determine and formulate a body of law as to the reasonableness of union imposed fines.

C. The Board Is Peculiarly Suited To Recognize And Administer Uniformly Those Factors Determinative Of What Is A "Reasonable" Fine.

The Board, if the decision of the Court below is to be upheld, would have the authority to determine whether the Act is violated by the particular fine imposed by a union. The effect of shifting to other fora, scores of different courts of various shades of jurisdiction, the determination of the reasonableness of fines legally imposed, would be to place an undue burden upon individual employees and to create a lack of uniformity of justice in the administration by the courts of an issue which can be affected by so many different tests in so many different parts of the country.

Within the Board's own experience under Section 8(b)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act,[53] we find that the particular facts of a case are to be evaluated, and similar standards applied, in deciding whether an unfair labor practice has been committed.

For example, the Board probably would take into consideration the motivation of the imposition of the fine as well as the amount thereof. See, e.g., Carpenters, Local 22, supra. Other factors would include the duration of the strike (see Granite State Joint Board, [53]This Section limits the amount of dues or initiation fees that a union may charge employees. The Board is instructed to look to "all the circumstances" to decide if a given amount is "excessive or discriminatory." The "wages currently paid to the employees effected" are deemed to be relevant to the Board's determination. 29 U.S.C. Section 158(b)(5). See, TV & Radio Broadcasting Studio Employees, supra, at footnote 42.

supra). Other factors might be (a) the employees' personal circumstances, particularly their financial desperation; (b) fines imposed by the union, if any, for similar reasons and under like circumstances; (c) whether the amount of the fine is such as to be inordinately disproportionate to the needed protection; (d) the compensation received while employed during the strike; (e) the level of strike benefits, if any, made available to the striking employees; (f) the availability of less harsh union remedies; (g) whether or not the penalty would "impair the member's status as an employee." Pet. App. 29a-30a. Similarly, the method of the payment of the fine and the time period within which it must be paid could be relevant factors, as well as the manner in which charges were filed and processed which led to the imposition of the fine or other penalty. In assessing the reasonableness of a fine the Board might also consider whether or not other sanctions or punishments were imposed upon those who were fined. In the instant case, for instance, members were barred from holding office in the Union for a period of five years. Still another possible factor in determining the reasonableness of the fine might be whether the employees were informed in advance that they would be violating a union rule if they worked behind a picket line, and whether they were warned in advance that they would be penalized and to what extent or degree.[54]

It is inconceivable that the multiplicity of factors that may be involved in resolving the issue of reasonableness can be entrusted to the courts, rather than to a single administrative body, without the effects of confusion and inequities.

---

[54]Cf. A. 15, n. 19.

Also entitled to consideration is the likely effect upon the individual employee, faced with the choices of (a) exercising his rights under the Act or (b) a lawsuit at considerable personal expense in which he resists a substantial union fine. Denied the National Labor Relations Board as the forum for resolving this issue at no expense to him, will his rights under Section 7 be frustrated because he cannot afford an attorney and possible court costs to test the penalty assessed by an affluent union?

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, the judgment below should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

C. Dale Stout

C. DALE STOUT
FREDERICK A. KULLMAN
SAMUEL LANG
KULLMAN, LANG, INMAN
& BEE

Post Office Box 60118
New Orleans, Louisiana 70160

COUNSEL FOR THE
BOEING COMPANY

March, 1973